This is a feature which enables you to put your own keyboard shortcuts into Flash. Using the KEYMACRO you can easily set up any function (starting, saving, ending of a program,...) in order to automate the repetitive tasks you do on your computer. The program automatically recognizes a sequence of letters or keys pressed and translates it to a program you have setup. Keymacro is not just a text editor. You can put all sorts of things into a KEYMACRO program: you can use it to set up a BASIC program to type out a website or you can even type in a complex script! What's really cool about Keymacro is that you can put one program in a KEYMACRO which can be run in the background. You can then run a program whenever you press a button, or key combination, in your keyboard (or mouse). Using this technique you can set up your own video (or music) player, or you can create scripts for programs you use frequently. Features: - Push Button Shortcuts - Language Translations - Pictures and Text - KeyMapping - Automated Screensavers - Audio Messages - Compound Commands - Many other things not listed This is the demo/experimental version of a little toolkit designed to help people who are visually impaired (blind). It contains the basic components needed to make a braille display. However, it is not tested or maintained. It is rather a starting point for anyone interested in making their own braille display. The field of the present invention is liquid film forming compositions for fabricating patterned electrodeposited articles. Patterned electrodeposited articles have been used commercially in several industries for many years. One of the most popular applications for patterned electrodeposited articles has been as a decorative finish to concrete and cement slabs. The application of the patterned electrodeposited finish can be either a complete coating of the concrete, such as when used as a decorative finish for a cement slab, or can be an application of a decorative finish only along a selected area of the concrete. In such a finishing system, a patterned electrodeposited finish is applied to the concrete slab in a manner such that the finish is discontinuous and therefore, the appearance of the concrete slab is enhanced. Examples of such applications are disclosed in U.S. Pat. Nos. 4,104,050 and 4,414,132. In the patterned electrodeposition process, a metal substrate is typically plated on one surface of the substrate using a conventional plating technique in which a thin layer of a metallic pigment, such as chromium, is initially applied to the substrate. A suitable pigmented electroplating bath is then formed by combining a dispersion of the pigment with a suitable aqueous solution. This dispersion is then applied to the substrate by a suitable technique, such as immersion or spray application, and the resulting coated substrate is then electroplated to deposit the pigment on the substrate to obtain the desired decorative effect. Although the electrodeposited finish coating or pigmented coating is suitable for many decorative applications, it has the disadvantage that the pigment particles tend to flake or sp
