The price of infrastructure project has increased by 25% in last five years, the Supreme Court said on Thursday. A bench headed by Chief Justice Ramesh Siromoni said the rise in the cost of project was due to rising crude oil prices and concerns over the global economic situation. In an order today, the court said no project should be stalled because of non-payments. The Supreme Court had on October 7, 2016 issued a directive to both the state governments to ensure that no stalled projects were pursued from April 1, 2016. (This story has not been edited by Business Standard staff and is auto-generated from a syndicated feed.) Q: What type of statistical significance should I use for interpretation of negative binomial model's p-value? In a negative binomial model, the null hypothesis states that the observed difference between the two means comes from some other source, the alternative hypothesis states that the observed difference comes from the true difference, and the model is rejected in favor of the null hypothesis if the p-value (calculated using a test statistic of a Student's t-distribution) is below the significance level. I'm considering the following situations with a negative binomial model, and would like to confirm what type of statistical significance should I use for interpretation of the calculated p-value. We have observed an experiment, and calculated the p-value (e.g. 0.01) for the model's p-value. Should we interpret this as a strong indication of the difference between the means being different from zero? We have observed an experiment, and calculated the p-value (e.g. 0.10) for the model's p-value. Should we interpret this as a moderate indication of the difference between the means being different from zero? We have observed an experiment, and calculated the p-value (e.g. 0.40) for the model's p-value. Should we interpret this as a weak indication of the difference between the means being different from zero? In the hypothetical case 3, the p-value in this case would seem to be way too low, but does it make sense to say that the p-value simply tells us that it's more likely than not that the observed difference is due to some other source, so we're not confident that
