I recently came across this code in a tutorial. I was curious to know why we specify the return type as string with first and third operator? private static string SqlQuery(string sql) { using (SqlConnection con = new SqlConnection(ConStr)) { SqlCommand cmd = new SqlCommand(sql, con); con.Open(); return cmd.ExecuteScalar().ToString(); } } public static string Query1(string sql) { return SqlQuery(sql); } public static string Query2(string sql) { return SqlQuery(sql); } A: They actually aren't operator overloading, but that's a very misleading name for that technique. From the book Programming Language Design Patterns: Design Pattern: Method Grouping Method grouping is the practice of putting related methods in one place. In the .NET Framework, the authors of an interface use it to make sure they don't have to provide numerous methods that return a particular type. Also, sometimes a method is not polymorphic enough to return the right thing for all types; in that case, you can group related methods for one type. Design Pattern: Method Overloading Method overloading is when you have two methods with the same name and the same arity. Sometimes it's useful to overload a method, because some generic methods require you to perform some logic before they can produce a correct result. For example, I could define a method to parse a String object, like this:

```
public int Parse(String aString) { if (aString!= null) { 6d1f23a050
